Therapy dog spreads paw-sitive vibe

A therapy dog spreads paw-sitive vibe.

Therapy dogs are used in a program involving visits to people in hospitals, nursing homes, mental health facilities, senior homes, and shelters. The dogs lift spirits and assist with physical therapy.

SEAN TREMBLAY THE STARPHOENIX

Marianne Aubensee rescue old tires, broken glass and other garbage to produce works of art made from recycled material.

Aubensee, who lives 200 kilometres north of Saskatoon, creates sculptures out of ordinary works of art made from recycled materials. Aubensee's exhibit due to open this week at the village of Batoche.

Artistic expression transforms trash into sculpture.

JASON WARICK THE STARPHOENIX

JANET FRENCH THE STARPHOENIX

The plants to accelerate oil extraction from Alberta’s sands, as well as the innovations such as hydraulic fracturing that lay the groundwork for the planet,” says a film-maker commenting.

SEAN TREMBLAY THE STARPHOENIX

The plan to accelerate oil extraction from Alberta’s sands, as well as the innovations such as hydraulic fracturing that lay the groundwork for the planet’s future, is one of the features of the upcoming Council of Canadians’ annual general meetings in Saskatoon later this week. The film ex-...
Waldheim council backs pet limit bylaw

Owners plan to challenge fines

JEREMY WARBEN
THE STRATFORDIAN

Waldheim town councillors have no plans to change or review an animal control bylaw that a local couple is fighting, despite rulings that say their six pets are in no way dangerous.

Coun. Ken Ziegler said, "We'll just let them go through the legal system. If they lose, they lose; if they win, they win." Councillors voted 4-1 to uphold the bylaw, leaving the couple in legal limbo.

Coun. Bill Meinert was the lone dissenter, saying he thought the bylaw was unjust and unenforceable.

The bylaw was first examined in 2011 by the town of Waldheim, which had a bylaw that limited pets to four animals per household. A petition by town resident Douglas Dell was brought forward the following year and met with resistance. An opposition bylaw, which would raise that to six, was passed in 2012.

The bylaw was challenged by Dell and his wife, Anna-Belle Sudie, who are in the process of adopting a new dog, named Bo, to bring their total to six. They were told in May that the bylaw would remain in place and they would have until Nov. 15 to surrender their pets.

"We will not be going to court," said Anna-Belle Sudie. "We have this one last chance. We will take it to the provincial court in Saskatoon and have the original bylaw reviewed."

The couple contends the bylaw is too vague. "This is a bylaw that has been in place in another area for a number of years. It is one of the Health and Safety act, which is a provincial law."

The bylaw, which limits pets to four, states that "the keeping of the said limit as long as it is maintained."

"We believe there is a limit to the number of pets one can keep," said Ziegler. "We don't believe that the couple in question should keep such an excessive number of pets."

"They have not been able to live up to theiralian health, and they have not kept their requirements," said Meinert.

"They need to live up to their responsibility and take care of their pets," said Ziegler. "If they can't do that, then the pets will have to be surrendered.""Waldheim council backs pet limit bylaw

owners plan to challenge fines

JEREMY WARBEN
THE STRATFORDIAN

Waldheim town councillors have no plans to change or review an animal control bylaw that a local couple is fighting, despite rulings that say their six pets are in no way dangerous.

Coun. Ken Ziegler said, "We'll just let them go through the legal system. If they lose, they lose; if they win, they win." Councillors voted 4-1 to uphold the bylaw, leaving the couple in legal limbo.

Coun. Bill Meinert was the lone dissenter, saying he thought the bylaw was unjust and unenforceable.

The bylaw was first examined in 2011 by the town of Waldheim, which had a bylaw that limited pets to four animals per household. A petition by town resident Douglas Dell was brought forward the following year and met with resistance. An opposition bylaw, which would raise that to six, was passed in 2012.

The bylaw was challenged by Dell and his wife, Anna-Belle Sudie, who are in the process of adopting a new dog, named Bo, to bring their total to six. They were told in May that the bylaw would remain in place and they would have until Nov. 15 to surrender their pets.

"We will not be going to court," said Anna-Belle Sudie. "We have this one last chance. We will take it to the provincial court in Saskatoon and have the original bylaw reviewed."

The couple contends the bylaw is too vague. "This is a bylaw that has been in place in another area for a number of years. It is one of the Health and Safety act, which is a provincial law."

The bylaw, which limits pets to four, states that "the keeping of the said limit as long as it is maintained."

"We believe there is a limit to the number of pets one can keep," said Ziegler. "We don't believe that the couple in question should keep such an excessive number of pets."

"They have not been able to live up to theiralian health, and they have not kept their requirements," said Meinert.

"They need to live up to their responsibility and take care of their pets," said Ziegler. "If they can't do that, then the pets will have to be surrendered."